

"Bradford, you're fired!" The door had opened silently behind me. I turned from the cards that were spread on the table before me, and looked into the stern eyes of James T. Mather, sales-manager of the Continental Dry Goods Company. "You don't mean—" I stammered. "Exactly that, Bradford," answered my employer, closing the door behind him. "We're through with you, and there will be another man in your territory next week. I have written you time and time again, I have given you advice, I have tried to awaken some ambition in you—but to no avail. A man like you needs the feel of steel before he amounts to anything. So I'm giving it to you straight. You're fired, fired because you are not worth the expense money it takes to keep you in the territory. You'll leave your samples here at this hotel, and your successor will pick them up Monday. You will receive a check as soon as it can come from the home office, paying you in full to the first of next month. We're through with you for all time, Bradford! You're a failure!" And he turned and left the room.
