

Excerpt from Meteors, Aerolites, and Falling Stars In the present work I propose to write the natural history of falling stars in the widest acceptation of the term. I have taken for model the justly celebrated little work of Francois Arago, entitled Notice sur le Tonnerre, in which that elegant writer made popular everything that is known concerning thunder and lightning. Before the appearance of that excellent little treatise in the pages of the Annuaire du Bureau des Longitudes for the year 1838, it may be safely asserted that little or nothing was known about thunder storms among the masses of the people. What Arago did for the grand phenomenon of lightning, I will attempt to do for a class of natural phenomena still more impressive, until recently much less observed, considerably rarer; and those, who have had the good fortune to witness in all its grandeur only one luminous meteor, will not hesitate in classing it among the most wonderful and astonishing spectacles that nature can present to us.
